SATURDAY, AUGUST 25, 1744.

Extract of a Private Letter.

Paris, Auguſt 21.

ACcording to the laſt Letters we have from Metz, the King's Life is ſaid to be entirely out of Danger; upon which, however, we cannot abſolutely depend; ſince the ſame Letters ſay, that his Majeſty is exceedingly weak, and that there is Reaſon to fear his Strength will return but ſlowly. He will, very probably, return to Verſailles, as ſoon as his Health will permit, in Compliance with the Advice of all his Phyſicians, who think, that the Fatigues of a Campaign, after ſo great a Shock as this has been, might ſtill be fatal. The Loſs of the Queen and Dauphin, who are both at preſent at Metz with his Majeſty, and the Hurry occaſioned by the King's Illneſs, has put an equal Stop to Pleaſure and to Buſineſs in this City; inſomuch, that a Seaſon ſo languid as the preſent, is ſcarce within the Memory of Man.

Such as dare ſpeak of political Affairs here are pretty much divided in their Sentiments, as to the Conſequences of the King's Death, in caſe it had happened, or ſhould fall out through the Effects of this ſudden Attack. Some are of Opinion, that it would have created no conſiderable Alteration, but that our Councils at home, and the War abroad, would have gone on much as they do; becauſe, ſay they, the Struggle, with reſpect to the Miniſtry, is over; and there is no Reaſon to apprehend, that the new King would have added to the Difficulties he muſt have ſtruggled with; that of changing the Miniſtry at ſo critical a Juncture. But others think juſt the reverſe; and that the Duke of Orleans muſt neceſſarily have had a large Share in the Management of Affairs, which would have ſoon taken them out of the Hands in which they are at preſent. To judge indeed from Appearances, the latter was more probable than the former; for a certain great Miniſter appeared to have loſt a great Part of his Influence, as ſoon as the King's Illneſs was heard of; and ſome Members of the Council ventured to propoſe the ſending the Marquis de Fenelon to the Hague, with Offers for a general Peace; which much have been accepted.

Our laſt Advices from the Rhine inform us, that among other new Projects, form'd by the Court of Franckfort, that from which the greateſt Succeſs is hoped, is the ſending a conſiderable Body of French Troops, to act in Conjunction with the Army of the Imperial Allies, for the Recovery of Bavaria; which would reduce Things to their firſt Situation, put the Auſtrians between Two Fires, and introduce an Army, on both Sides, into the Neighbourhood of Vienna. It is true, that Prince Charles, by repaſſing the Rhine, might come upon the Back of the Imperialiſts; but then, no doubt, the Marſhals Noailles and Belleiſle would follow him; eſpecially if there be any Truth in a Report that is ſpread here, as to a Neutrality being concluded for the Low Countries, in Conſideration of the King's delivering up his new Conqueſts, and truſting the Security of his Frontiers to his Neighbours. Yet, after all, this may be no more than a Rumour ſpread by the Miniſtry, to quiet the Fears, and to hush the Jealouſies, of the People, who are much more uneaſy and impatient than they were ever known to be, even in the laſt War; nor was the Kingdom then much more exhauſted.

The Caſe is melancholy as it is, ſince we are almoſt entirely worn out, in Point of Men and Money, while our Trade is entirely ruined in all Quarters; but, without Queſtion, our Misfortunes would have been greatly increaſed by the King's Death, before the Marriage of the Dauphin, which would have brought us once again within Sight of a diſputed Succeſſion, and have revived the Factions that diſturbed the Repoſe of the Kingdom in the Days of the late Regent. The Council of the Finances have at preſent under their Conſideration, the Means of raiſing what may diſcharge the Expences of the next Campaign, and the Extraordinaries of this, which amount already to upwards of 25 Millions.

We have had lately no Letters from Italy, which occaſions ſome Speculation. A Courier that arrived not long ago from the King of Sardinia, was ſaid to have brought Propoſals of Peace; but we are ſince informed, that his Errand was quite of another Nature; in ſhort, he brought a Letter addreſſed to the Marſhal Noailles, from the Secretary of State to his Sardinian Majeſty, in which that Miniſter informs him, that the King his Maſter, cannot but look on the Invaſion of his Country by French Troops, as a Declaration of War; and therefore can no longer reſtrain his good Subjects, the Vandois, from ſeeking, in France, the Reparation of the Loſſes they ſuſtain from the Jawieſs Pundering of the French Soldiers, who have burnt ſeveral Villages in the Vall y of Stura, without [illegible] at the Ceremony of demanding Contribution[illegible]
